What would I be doing? Transportation, distribution, and logistics occupations include everyone that works to move materials and products, whether that's across town or across the country. Common responsibilities range from loading and driving cargo to managing and coordinating shipments and deliveries.

How much money could I be earning? Depending on experience and responsibilities, hourly wages in the transportation, distribution, and logistics industry range from Material Movers who make up to $19 an hour to Managers that earn as much as $65 an hour.

Where would I be working? Transportation, distribution, and logistics occupations exist everywhere from the open road to warehouses and factories.

Is this a growing field? This field already employs thousands of people in Northwest Indiana and is expected to grow 1% through 2024 with 241 new job openings coming in the next six years.

What skills should I have? To work in this field, it's important that you are able to pay close attention to details and be good at following procedures and rules related to load and shipping regulations.

What education or training do I need? Almost all occupations are open to those with a high school diploma or equivalent as well as some career training. Once hired, these positions require short-term on-the-job training. Driver positions will require specific licenses. WorkOne can help if you are in need of a high school equivalent or access to training.
